Excerpt: . . . treatment which we have observed before in the rendering of the temples and of the eyes, deeply sunk in their large orbits. Leaving the artistic merit of the drawings apart, and it is great, there is much to interest in this glance back into a vanished past which held so much that was brilliant and accomplished. Passing up the stairs to Lady Ilchesters sittingroom, we find a small head in oils of Mary Augusta, Lady Holland, and also a portrait of H. R. H. the Due dAumale, which suffered in the fire of 1871 and has been partially repainted by the artist. It represents a fair-haired man with moustache and imperial and keen blue eyes. There is also a full-length of Lady Holland in the room in which Addison died, but by far the finest portrait was the one in the Nice straw-hat painted...
